Honor Students Presented

The following honor students the lower house and one-third of the senate, 32, must fight next year from now. In every congressional district, the sitting member has good reason to feel that if he runs on a record of having voted to support reductions in veterans' compensation, he will have the opposition of the largest, most highly organized and most politically conscious group of voters in his district, the veterans, their families and friends. He will, speaking broadly, have the opposition of all veterans, not merely those affected by President Roosevelt's reductions and removals from the list, for every veteran regards himself at some time a potential pensioner just as every veteran of the Civil war became, with the passage of time, a pensioner. Every congressman knows this. If he is a congressman who in March voted for the bill authorizing the President
