A LOVELY TIME.

Oh! dear, mamma, we've had such fun Since you have been away; We got the brand new mucroscope That aunt boughs yesterday. And took a drop of vinegar To leok at, and, oh! dear, The things we saw a-viggling 'round Were very, very queer.

Some had no heads, and there was scarce A kee among them all, And many of the bigger ones Kept awallowing the small. It scared us awfully to see Them act ao strapeg and bad, But, oh! mamma, you can't blank what A breek time are had!

A lovely time we had! -Arkansaw Traveler.

WHY HE DISAPPEARED.

It was a bright summer morning, and up the stairs with the lightness of a fairy she rapped at the panels of a door upon the next landing. Thomas Jackson was what is termed an eminently respectable man. By dint of hard work and undeviating integrity he had risen to a confidential post in the firm of Messrs. Chest & Lead, tea brokers, of Mineing lane. Mr. Jackson was a wifower, and neither Nell nor her brother Bob had the slightest recollection of their mother the slightest recollection of their mother. Bob was a clerk in the general postoffice, and he and his sister Nell had been brought up by an aunt on their mother's aide until their father returned to England from some employment in which he had been engaged abroad, when he at once took the house at Chiswick and brought his chil-drem to live with him. He was a hard working, palastaking man, and after a time gave the highest satisfaction to his employers, who had at first been a little

As years, however, rolled by they congratu-lated themselves in having strained a point by which they had secured the services of so diligent and responsible an employe. It had long been a habit of Mr. Jackson to rise early and have an hour's work in

By mutual consent both men stopped, and the stranger, releasing his arm from that of Mr. Jackson, broke the silence. "Well, Jim Sutton," said he, "you are a cool customer if ever there was one." Mr. Jackson quivered, but made no re-ply. "To think," continued the stranger, "that I should have laid my hand on you but, oh, Bob, what can he have done?" "Nothing wrong, that I will swear to," replied Bob, alittle illogically: "he was too good a father for that. Let us, however, consider the best course to pursue." Long and earnestly they debated, and the early dawn still found them considering the matter. At last a plan was agreed on. From that day Robert Jackson's mode of life was entirely altered. Though he To return to the little house at Chiswick. The Cause of the Gulf Stream. Now what is the cause of the Gulf stream? Some say that the water in the tropics being heated, and consequently lighter than the cold, heavy polar water, flows northward on the surface, and the other water southward underneath. Others say that the trade winds, always blowing in one direction toward the west, blow the water along, too, and so begin and after-ward keep up the movement. Both are, parhaps, right to a certain ex-tent as to currents in general, but the Gulf "That I will have him out of this," re-turned Bob firmly. "Do you think that I would have our father in this living hell?" "No. I never thought that you would; but, oh, Bob, what can he have done?"

Both are, parhaps, right to a certain ex-tent as to currents in general, but the Gulf stream is probably almost wholly due to the winds and the waves alone. The water is pushed by the wind and thrown by the waves into the Caribbean sea, from the water runs into the gulf of Mexico, and from there it escapes through the strait of Florida into the Atlantic ocean.
